A rosette-like granuloma was observed in the glabrous skin of the dorsal surface of the tongue in a 4-year-old female dog. The lesion was characterized by well-demarcated, circumscribed, erythematous macules that were covered with a coarse, raised, hyperkeratotic plaque. The lesion was caused by the superficial, superficial, and deep dermal invasion of Malassezia furfur.Number of Worksites With Available Data on Arsenic Contamination and Risk of Disease Among U.S. Adults, by Race/Ethnicity-Based Monitoring: United States, 2004-2015. Arsenic exposure can result in various adverse health outcomes. The availability of well-characterized data on arsenic exposure and its health effects is essential to inform efforts to reduce arsenic exposure among the U.S. population. To assess the percentage of worksites in the United States with information on arsenic exposure and arsenic-associated disease, by race/ethnicity and health outcome. Cross-sectional data were analyzed for the percentage of U.S. worksites with information on arsenic exposure and risk of disease. Data were obtained from National Environmental and Occupational Safety and Health Administration (NAOSH) and other sources. Percentages were weighted by the number of employees per worksite and reported across occupational sectors. The percentage of worksites with information on arsenic exposure and arsenic-associated disease was calculated among U.S. worksites that provided information on the arsenic chemical, method, and dose. The percentage of U.S. worksites with arsenic exposure data varied by industry, race/ethnicity, and risk of disease, and ranged from 12.4% (in utilities) to 89.0% (in manufacturing). The percentage of U.S. worksites with information on arsenic-associated cancer ranged from 4.9% (in manufacturing) to 64.9% (in mining). The percentage of U.S. worksites with information on non-cancer diseases ranged from 14.2% (in utilities) to 52.3% (in manufacturing). U.S. worksites have higher percentages of information on arsenic exposure and arsenic-associated disease among non
