The International Agency for Research on Cancer (IARC) announced on Thursday that it will work with the WHO (World Health Organization) to review whether cigarettes have a carcinogenic or mutagenic effect. The director-general of WHO Tedros Adhanom Ghebreyesus has described the review as a “historic step” that he hopes will lead to a ban on smoking in workplaces. “The WHO is fully committed to raising awareness and prevention efforts on the harmful effects of tobacco and other forms of tobacco product use,” he said. The announcement follows a large body of scientific work that demonstrated a link between smoking and diseases, particularly cancer. However, a 2018 independent cancer expert review, published by the WHO, recommended a reduced classification of the health hazards of tobacco, claiming that there was a lack of conclusive evidence for the link between smoking and cancer. “We have reviewed the evidence and agree that there is convincing evidence of the carcinogenicity of tobacco,” said Carcinogenicity Expert Group (CEG) member Dora James. James was a member of the 2012 IARC Monographs Working Group, which concluded that smoking is carcinogenic to humans. “I will present evidence from different angles, from molecular mechanisms to epidemiology, including genetic components,” he said. Unsatisfactory evidence In 2013, the Working Group found that “there is sufficient evidence in human beings to classify cigarettes as carcinogenic to humans (Group 1)”. Speaking of the new classification, James added: “Although the risk of suffering disease in the future as a result of smoking is small, for this risk to be minimised, the most effective means at our disposal are public health measures such as strengthened tobacco control programmes and decreasing the number of cigarettes smoked.” Phrasing the expected classification on smoking as “hazardous to health”, James noted that tobacco control efforts remain inadequate worldwide.
